八、課程摘要：

In the field of law, capacity is usually defined as the ability to understand the nature and effect of one's acts and used to refer to the legal status. In the meantime, capacity is also frequently used in the psychiatric field and referred to the clinical judgment which addresses the threshold requirement for persons to retain the power to make decisions for themselves. Despite the difficulty in defining capacity as it is subject to cultural contexts and juridical systems, increasing core elements and consensus in determining mental capacities in civil issues have been proposed in the past decades.

The issues of mental capacities in the elderly are more unique and have been attracting public attention because of the fluidity and vulnerability in the very population. This talk will be delivered in two sections, and, in the first section, the speaker will provide a general introduction on mental capacities across the local laws, the attributes of capacities, the assessment, the frameworks to facilitate capacity evaluations, and the implications for clinical practice in the field of geriatric psychiatry.

In the latter part of the session, the speaker will focus on the relevance of capacity to driving issues specifically in the elderly. By collating the available research and the updated regulations in Taiwan and other countries, recommendations for the practicing psychiatrists, policy amendments, and future research will be proposed in the end of this session. In the end of the talk, the audiences are expected to have basic understanding of capacities in the elderly population and the senile driving issues from the perspectives of capacity.
